You're listening to Snippets from the Summit with your host, Scot McKay.

How's it going, gentlemen? This is your main man ScottMcKay coming at you again with another Snippet from the Summit as part of the Mountain Top Podcast from X & Y Communications. Close your eyes and picture your dream woman. Yeah, you know what? You probably got a mental image pretty much immediately, didn't you? Yet, despite all the stock answers that both men and women give about who it is they're looking for, and even though we always envision some.

When asked to, we probably won't see the one who really actually attracts us in real life coming at all. Indeed, many people in general think they have a clear mental picture of who they're looking for in a partner. For example, men get really upset that they don't fit the classic six six six stereotype that women always say they want, and then a lot of those same guys turn around and claim they want a woman who pretty much looks like a supermodel. Well

Ultimately, however, since people are individuals, we tend to actually find ourselves most attracted to someone we didn't necessarily have completely envisioned in our imaginations beforehand. You guys already know this is true. A certain woman comes along we didn't have in mind, and she really just does it for us. Well, that's because our imaginations are limited. And when we're asked to picture the kind of person we want, you know, we can do that. We have capable imaginations as human beings. And you know what? Before we throw women under the bus for having the same inclinations, if women are asked which boxes they would like the man of their dreams to check, they'll be able to answer it. And they'll answer it in stereotypical fashion. I want him to be tall. I want him to be rich. I want him to be handsome. I want him to be able to do this and that.

All these stereotypes are what come to mind. And as a man, you shouldn't let any report of how women list those stereotypes over and over affect you in any way, shape, or form, let alone rattle you or discourage you. Why? Because in real life, human beings are individuals. Each one brings a very specific set of traits. And you know what?

Attraction is not a choice. Just like David D'Angelo said years ago, when a person comes along who just who makes us feel a certain way, then we start backing the logical pieces into that parking spot to accommodate what we said we wanted, right? So in other words, a woman may have said she wanted a guy who was this way. Then a certain guy comes along who makes her feel the way she's never felt before that she didn't see coming.

She just wants more of him. She misses him. She craves more and more of him. But on paper, he's not what she asked for. Or who she envisioned coming her way. Well, you know what? We as men can either feel insecure about that and feel like she's going to trade us up on a better model as soon as he comes along. You know, some guy who meets her specs, right? But you know what, guys? With women,

How they feel is always going to supersede any checkbox that they had marked down on paper. You could take that to the bank. And here's another thing you can bank on. It's not gender specific. You can say you want a supermodel with big fake boobies and maybe no tattoos and no kids, and she's got a certain hair color and a certain eye color. She's got Long legs all the way up to her ass, and then a woman comes along who is completely different than that, and you just want her. You forget you ever even thought about this stereotypical woman who society has projected as the perfect woman. Gentlemen, this is how the universe actually works. This is how the world actually goes around. And here's the important thing to remember: the women who come along.

And surprise us, perhaps. You can even call it surprise attraction if you want a buzzword for it. The women who come along and stoke or ignite that in us, they're the women we should favor and go after. Because instead of being a classic ten or society's example of the perfect woman, they're our ten in particular. They're the woman we really want. And by the way, you're not settling.

If your vision of a ten differs from society's or even differs from your preconceived notion before you actually met this woman you're so drawn to, you can relax into and trust that the woman who comes along and is your ten is genuinely so is who you want. And guess what, guys? Because she's more quote unquote perfectly suited to you.

That's going to be a stronger bond. That's going to be a stronger attraction because you know from the visceral feeling you experienced and having that experience in real life that it's genuine. It's not something anybody influenced you to think or to believe you wanted. It happened, it was real, and yes, you could bank on it. One final note here. It's important here that we as men in particular really need to start ignoring those real.

Wrote studies and surveys that claim members of the other sex prefer certain traits, et cetera, because ultimately they almost never represent personal individual reality. So, in other words, if you start seeing all these studies about, women prefer tall guys, et cetera, et cetera, guys, stop reading the studies. Do your best with who you are.

Deserve what you want, make women feel a certain way, and you'll soon be crumpling up all of those studies, at least figuratively, and throwing them in the trash can where they belong.
