How's it going, gentlemen, this is your main man Scot McKay coming at you again with another snippet from the summit as part of The Mountain Top Podcast. Today, I want to talk to you about men and women and attraction. And we'll kick things off today by recalling a certain bumper sticker that was popular certainly 2030 years ago, and I still see some times today that said very simply black letters on a white background, skateboarding is not a crime. Now, of course, skateboarding in and of itself isn't a crime but because some certain skateboarders were known to go ransack public places or anything that was shaped like a halfpipe that was built into the architecture of really, most any building or public park anywhere. They got a bad reputation for kind of being mischievous and creating trouble and just being a nuisance. But it was just a few bad skateboarders who ruined everyone's reputation, right? Most people just simply wanted to skateboard and have fun. Well, it would be easy to connect the dots and believe that being a heterosexual male adult, is not unlike being a skateboarder nowadays. Given that for as long as we can remember, our culture has talked about women having sex as quote unquote, giving it up or putting out or as we as men score and get lucky and so forth. It's easy to think women are designed to play keep away from us as men regarding sex, right? Well, this perception isn't helped any by angry women complaining about the male gaze and so forth. And more recently, the me to movement despite its stated intentions, well, it kind of ended up shaming good, decent men into fearing the demonstration of any sexual interest of women at all. You may remember at the time, it's been about what seven or eight years now, the concept of rape got bandied about freely to the point where if a woman's fast food order was messed up by the male behind the counter, he basically raped her, right, it was crazy. But bear in mind that talk subsided quickly. Did you notice that and it was the women who expressed deep regret that their very real experience of having been actually raped, if unfortunately, that was the case, was being cheap and very much by that agenda to rape a fine everything. So at least we calm down culturally from that. But meanwhile, we as men of good character are still here, wondering what to do visa vie those other apparent boundaries that have been applied between men and women, relative to sexual attraction. Well, gentlemen, today's message couldn't be more simple. Attraction is not a crime. The truth is the vast, vast majority of women out there are heterosexual, just like the vast majority of you. And yes, they're horny, and they love sex, if you believe otherwise, you've either been fooled successfully by an agenda. Or you're simply projecting your own frustrations in that area thus far upon women, instead of taking ownership. Think of it this way. What's a heterosexual woman to do if not for heterosexual men? Well, apart from postmodern sperm donor ship stuff, at the baseline, you remain the secret to the continuation of humankind as we know it. So, practically speaking, here's the deal. First of all, whatever pain damage or even Ill Will has been created by a certain man, or a certain few men in a woman's life, you don't have to be part of that problem. You do not have to accept the blame, or the shame. And when you meet any woman who would seek to play the victim card with you as such, you can certainly assert you're not that guy. Better yet, you can stop participating in the charade and run away. It's just not your problem. Unless and until you accept it, which you shouldn't. So what about the natural order of flirting with and attracting women who aren't broken then? Well, first order of business there is to stop assuming all women are angry man haters. Most aren't gentlemen. It's just that the women who actually love men are kind of a silent majority nowadays. They're not the vocal ones on the internet. After all, they're not upset and grabbing the mic. They're happy. They're content. They like flirting. They like sex. They like men. There's nothing to complain about. The magic here lies almost purely and breathtakingly simply in the art of making a woman feel safe and secure. Most of us as men have no idea how much fear women live under realize that and it seems natural that they put up a protection mechanism early on. But the very moment a woman senses you are a protector instead of a predator that guard drops considerably. Give women space. Always ask yourself if you're making a woman feel at ease versus making her feel uneasy. That's a question you must always ask inside your head whenever interacting with any woman. And as for the male gaze, well, there's a massive difference in a woman's estimation between gawking at her and a warm smile. You may have to trust me a bit on this one at first, but when women dressed in yoga pants looking all cute to go grocery shopping, they indeed know exactly what they're doing. But they're not inviting rape. Of course not. They're simply doing their best to walk the tightrope they have to in order to get a good decent man like you to notice them. Smile warmly, and start that fun light conversation. From there, the sky's the limit. Here's the bottom line, gentlemen, women want to attract and be attracted. Now it's simply up to you to lead based on a solid understanding of women and their needs. Want to talk about this or anything else? Scott at mountaintop podcast.com Be good out there.
